

Millennials in the Workplace: How Do Managers Inspire Them?

The Millennial Generation (born 1981–1995) is 76 million strong, and many managers seem to have great difficulty understanding and inspiring them. And that creates a problem, because they comprise 36 percent of today's workforce, a percentage that will grow to 46 percent by 2020. Millennials are tech savvy, ambitious, and fond of working in teams; have a desire to make the world a better place; and like to do things their own way. Unfortunately, some managers see them as lazy, entitled, self-focused, and impatient—hence difficult to manage (White, 2015). The truth is that Millennials offer a set of skills and a mind-set that fit well with the challenges facing organizations today. It is essential for managers to understand how this generation thinks, what they are looking for in the workplace, and how to inspire them to contribute their unique talents.

Millennials have a lot to offer their organizations—in short, they are a trusting and optimistic generation that is tech savvy far beyond earlier generations. They can absorb large amounts of data, and they place high value on social causes in which they can band together with others to achieve change. They are highly educated and want to make a contribution, though they do get impatient at times. Hence, it is imperative that managers understand this generation of associates and how to inspire them—not manage them and just deal with them. Managers who learn how to truly inspire Millennials to contribute their talents to address the many challenges facing organizations today could far outperform their competitors.

In 2020 Millennials will comprise 46% of the workforce

Ken^{THE}Blanchard
COMPANIES

The Leadership Difference.®

In this paper, we will provide a deeper understanding of how Millennials think and how this relates to workplace demands today. We will describe a research project focused on what managers can do to inspire Millennials to contribute their best.

Understanding Millennials

Millennials were raised in a time of relative prosperity by Baby Boomer and Gen X parents who wanted to give the best to their children. However, their formative years were also a time of increasing domestic and international terrorism and violence. Hence, they have developed a big-picture view and a desire for things to be better in their world. They have a reputation for ambition, efficiency, fondness for working in teams, and a mix of audacity and casualness in relationships at work. They can also be impatient, having been raised with highly stimulating technology that serves to define their way of being. They are a generation in search of meaning in their lives—they want to know they are making a difference through their work, their volunteer activities, and their lives in general. In short, they want to do meaningful work and embrace new challenges on a regular basis. Also known as digital natives, they have a unique prowess with technology, especially computers and the Internet. They have a zest for innovation and an ability to use information to create innovation. They tend to view coworkers, and even their managers, as people with whom to collaborate—they do not like to feel subordinate to someone, but rather prefer to be treated as a colleague who has something to contribute.

Below we summarize the key attributes of Millennials (Raines and Arnsperger, 2010):

1. Trusting, optimistic, and ambitious
2. Tech savvy (it is practically in their DNA)
3. Collaborative by nature
4. Relaxed about authority (want colleagues, not bosses)
5. Cause oriented (big-picture focus)
6. Loyal and inclusive
7. Socially responsible and civic minded

We may ask how these attributes fit with the needs of today's organizations. The world today is more complex than ever, and our organizations need people who, like Millennials, can absorb large amounts of information and make sense of it. Furthermore, complex challenges require teamwork to be solved, and Millennials seek out and thrive on teamwork. Their technological prowess is a valuable resource for organizations, because organizations that do not make good use of technology and its ever-changing nature will certainly fall behind their competitors. Finally, there is a need today to see the big picture and to ensure that organizations are socially responsible—something that seems to have been lost over the last few decades. Millennials desire meaningful work and want their efforts to matter. Overall, it is clear that the needs of the world and our organizations are quite consistent with the hopes and abilities of Millennials. What remains vague is how to best tap into their capabilities. In short, how do managers of Millennials inspire them to make the contributions of which they are capable and which our organizations need?

What Managers Can Do to Inspire Millennials

In 2014, we began to explore what it is that managers do to inspire Millennial workers. We began with an open-ended survey to explore what they would say without any guided prompts. We asked, “What does a manager do that inspires people to use their knowledge, experience, and internal motivation to the best of their abilities?” We asked them to provide us with two or three things leaders do to inspire people. Over several months, we collected these surveys from 92 young employees. A content analysis of the responses yielded an 18-item questionnaire using a 7-point Likert scale ranging from “Not at All Important” to “Vitality Important.” The items in that survey are included in Appendix 1.

Next, we collected responses to the 18-item questionnaire from 640 Millennials in the workplace. Our analysis showed that of these important items, five were most vital for managers to use to inspire Millennials. The five items found to be most vitally important in inspirational leaders are:

- Trust and empower employees
- Provide regular feedback to everyone—both positive and corrective feedback—when and where appropriate
- Make sure that goals AND expectations are clearly stated and then hold people accountable for achieving outcomes, while helping us when and where needed
- Be open to hearing my new ideas and my input
- Do not micromanage. Make the vision and goals clear and allow employees flexibility in how to achieve the goals

Overall, these results tell us that Millennials want to be treated like valued colleagues who are given clear definitions of expectations, regular feedback, and a receptive ear by managers about their ideas. They do not want to feel micromanaged, but rather to feel trusted and empowered. In short, they value clarity and accountability and the opportunity to contribute their ideas to the collective good. They embrace transparency from their managers and want the opportunity to contribute.

Next we take a closer look at these five items to provide a more in-depth understanding. We will share comments from respondents that elucidate the thinking behind the rating of each item.

TRUST AND EMPOWER EMPLOYEES

As one respondent put it, “When my manager trusts me, it makes me want to do an extremely good job so I do not let them down and so that trust increases.” Millennials like leaders who believe in them enough to trust them with significant responsibilities and to empower them to use their experience and knowledge. They believe they have something to contribute and they respond well to managers who acknowledge this belief. Millennials are a very well-educated generation, and as Millennials want to be treated like valued colleagues who are given clear definitions of expectations, regular feedback, and a receptive ear by managers about their ideas.

Millennials want coaching that helps them grow and feel engaged.

such they have a lot to offer companies in the twenty-first century, especially in areas that relate to the use of technology and to innovative thinking. An annual survey conducted at Deloitte (2015) of 7,800 Millennials in 29 countries finds Millennials want to contribute their ideas, and that fostering a culture of innovation keeps Millennials motivated and helps to drive company growth by generating game-changing innovations. The flip side of these findings is also true. As one respondent noted, “If I am not trusted to do my work, I will never complete it to my full potential, and I will feel that my work is unsatisfactory.” Millennials set a high bar for managers if they are to be inspired. One respondent succinctly noted, “Without trust there can be no empowerment, and without both trust and empowerment, there is no inspiration.”

PROVIDE REGULAR FEEDBACK TO EVERYONE

One respondent wrote, “Taking the time to give feedback for a job well done as well as constructive feedback on how to improve makes people feel valued by the manager and makes them want to grow and develop into a top-notch worker.” Another respondent noted simply, “I want to know what I can improve upon to be a better team member.” Millennials have a strong desire to continually improve in their work. Yes, they like positive feedback when it is deserved—for example, when they show advances in learning a new task or when they offer ideas that benefit the company. But they are not just about positive feedback. They want to know when they make mistakes or do things wrong—but they want the corrective feedback to respect them as a person who wants to grow and get better. Millennials want to contribute without fear of criticism, as this leads to a decline in motivation (Brack, 2012). There is a difference between criticism, which comes across as just negative, and corrective feedback, which comes across as explaining shortcomings and then showing an employee how to improve. Millennials want coaching that helps them grow and feel engaged. Managers may perceive it as arduous to attend to “needy” Millennials, but if they provide regular feedback, they will open up the possibility of Millennials achieving extraordinary results through productivity, creativity, and a vigorous work ethic.

SET CLEAR GOALS AND EXPECTATIONS, AND HOLD PEOPLE ACCOUNTABLE FOR OUTCOMES

As one respondent put it, “People do not like surprises—make expectations clear up front.” Another one said, “When the manager explains goals, the employee can take ownership.” Millennials fundamentally want clarity of expectations. They feel it is unfair and ineffective not to define goals and expectations up front. They want to be held accountable but with no surprises. They feel they have capabilities to apply to their jobs, but those capabilities can work well for them and the organization only if they know what the goals are and what a good job looks like. Another respondent said, “There is nothing more frustrating than to not know what you are doing and how to do it. Such confusion leads to poor results, frustration, and employees looking for another job.” Millennials want to feel that their work is meaningful in a larger worldview, and clear expectations tied to clear goals and a vision make this possible. They want to feel they can achieve goals in their own way, but at the same time, they want help when they are unclear on how to achieve the goals. So, set clear goals and hold them accountable, but offer help when it is needed. However, there is another important element about goals for Millennials. The goals they are working on need to connect with their values and to a clear sense that their work is giving back to society in general. Millennials think of success not just in terms of goal accomplishment and career advancement, but also in terms of contribution to society.

BE OPEN TO HEARING MY NEW IDEAS AND MY INPUT

As one respondent stated, “When managers listen to people’s ideas, energy levels can soar—employees feel really important and valued.” Millennials are eager for managers who will listen to them and their ideas. They appear to be very much in touch with the basic human need for people they work with to exercise active listening and validation. Conversely, another respondent stated, “I would feel very unmotivated if I felt my ideas were falling on deaf ears.” Millennials have been told throughout their lives that they are special and talented, and they want to prove their worth in the workplace, just like in school and on sports teams. Millennials want active, involved leadership, plus a feeling of collaborative teamwork and unstructured access to information. Implicit in this finding is that information and ideas flow in both directions—from manager to employee and from employee to manager, which supports the idea that Millennials want their ideas to be heard, not dismissed or undervalued. Millennials want to work with people who foster and are open to innovative thinking, and if you listen to the ideas of Millennials, you are likely to hear some cutting-edge things (Deloitte, 2015). Millennials want to be asked for their input, because they feel they have something to offer—and they do.

DO NOT MICROMANAGE—SET CLEAR GOALS AND ALLOW FLEXIBILITY IN HOW TO ACHIEVE THEM

One respondent noted, “Leaders need to trust their people to do their jobs but be there when needed to help—such as when an employee is new in a task.” Millennials do not respond well to feeling they are being micromanaged (who does?), but it is important not to leave them to flounder with little or no guidance. Managers have to remember that Millennials may lack workplace experience and thus seek guidance on how to succeed and grow in their jobs. Managers must find the right balance between guidance and too much managing if they are to inspire Millennials. One key point that came out of our research is that Millennials are drawn toward having the space for trial and error and subsequent small successes and failures. In this way they have freedom to learn but instruction to avoid huge failures. Another respondent added, “Micromanaging makes me feel insecure in my job and hesitant to use my skills—makes me unsure of myself.” Millennials prefer authority that is relaxed and polite and that treats them with respect. Further, Millennials want to make their work their own, to be allowed to do it their way, and to be treated as individuals who can contribute in new and unique ways. Millennials want coaching where they can contribute without fear of undue criticism (Brack, 2012). They do not Millennials think of success not just in terms of goal accomplishment and career advancement, but also in terms of contribution to society.

Alan and Ashley want to thank the Millennials—more than 700 strong—who responded to our surveys and helped us understand what managers can do to inspire them to contribute their abundant talents.

like to be part of a rigid hierarchy. They prefer mentors or coaches to managers—people who show them how to get things done when they are learning, but leave them to get things done their own way when they are ready to contribute.

Overall, it is fair to say that these five things managers can do to inspire Millennial workers may not seem earth shattering; however, taken together they provide clear guidance for managers who may be challenged in leading Millennials.

Similarities across Generations— Millennials, Gen Xers, and Baby Boomers

Certainly Millennials have a different vantage point on the world and the workplace than previous generations, and they have new skills and perspectives that can be very useful today. In order to tap into those skills and the energy of Millennials, they need to feel a part of something that is bigger than they are and will have an impact in the world. They also want to feel that they are part of a collective effort in their work and that their ideas are heard and used. They need a clear sense of where the company is going and how they fit in, but they also want the chance to make an impact in flexible ways regarding how they do their job.

Interestingly, many of these ideas could also apply to Baby Boomers and Gen Xers. A survey of more than 3,000 workers found many similar values across generations (Deal, 2007). For example: (1) everyone wants respect, (2) leaders must be trustworthy, (3) everyone wants to learn, and (4) everyone likes feedback. Our thought is that what gets played up as big differences across the generations may actually relate more to one's age—that is, to the stage of one's life. For example, when the two authors of this paper (one a Baby Boomer and one a Gen Xer) think back to when we were in our twenties, many of the things said about Millennials could apply to us at that time in our lives, as well. The biggest difference is that we, unlike Millennials, did not grow up in a global and digital world where technology and social connection via technology are taken for granted—we had to learn these things later in life.

However, for us in our twenties, we too were very optimistic about our ability to contribute in the workplace but wanted to do it a little differently than our older managers. We wanted to be engaged with others and with our managers in accomplishing work-related goals. We wanted to feel we were working in a place where we could trust others around us, and we had a lot to learn about working in organizations, as the Millennials currently do. Two comments sum up this line of thought. One, while Baby Boomer and Gen X workers and managers have changed, the five things managers can do to inspire Millennials would likely also be effective in managing Baby Boomers and Gen Xers. And two, it will be very interesting to see how Millennials change in what they value and feel as they grow older.

It is important to note that there is another generation coming behind the Millennials. A New York Times article calls them Generation Z (born after 1995), and they are just starting to enter the workforce (Smith and Aaker, 2013). They have grown up in a digital world, but one shaped by events like the 9/11 attack on the United States and two economic meltdowns in the early 2000s. In fact, every generation has its share of challenging times that shape their thinking. The question is, how will managers need to adapt to Gen Z workers? Somewhat tongue in cheek, we wonder what the generation after Gen Z will be called, given that we are at the end of the alphabet—will we start over with Gen A?

Conclusion

We hope that this short article will help managers better understand Millennials and that readers can benefit from our findings—the five key things to do to inspire Millennials. Yes, inspire, not just manage, because organizations are operating in challenging times, and Millennials have a lot to offer to organizations that adopt techniques that will inspire them.

Authors

Alan Randolph

Dr. Alan Randolph is a Senior Consulting Partner for The Ken Blanchard Companies. He facilitates many courses, including Situational Leadership® II and consults with clients all over the world. Alan has authored numerous academic and practitioner articles, several best-selling books on empowerment, and numerous training materials.

Ashley Randolph

Ashley Randolph is an independent consultant working with clients on marketing, branding, and event planning. She works directly with clients to create solutions that provide optimal scenarios for all parties involved. Ashley lives in New York City with her husband, Steve.

References

- Brack, J. (2012). "Maximizing Millennials in the Workplace." UNC Executive Development.
- Deal, J. (2007). "Retiring the Generation Gap: How Employees Young and Old Can Find Common Ground." Center for Creative Leadership.
- Deloitte (2015). "Mind the Gaps: The Deloitte Millennial Survey 2015." <http://www2.deloitte.com/content/dam/Deloitte/global/Documents/About-Deloitte/gx-wef-2015-millennial-survey-executivesummary.pdf>
- Raines, C. & Arnsparger, A. (2010). "Millennials at Work." Published in Generations at Work, Claire Raines Associates.
- Smith, E. E. & Aaker, J. L. (2013). "Millennial Searchers." New York Times, Sunday Review, December 1, 2013.
- White, G. B. (2015). "Do Millennials Make for Bad Employees?" The Atlantic.

The authors would like to dedicate the article to colleague John Carlos, the "Great Story Teller," who focused so much energy on finding ways for managers to inspire people.

About The Ken Blanchard Companies®

The Ken Blanchard Companies is the global leader in management training. For more than 35 years, Blanchard® has been creating the best managers in the world, training over 150,000 people per year. From the award-winning First-time Manager program—based on the time-tested secrets of the best-selling business book, The New One Minute Manager®—to Situational Leadership® II, the most widely taught leadership model in the world, Blanchard is the expert in management training across all levels of an organization and is the provider of choice by Fortune 500 companies as well as small to medium businesses, governments, and educational and nonprofit organizations.

To learn more, visit
www.kenblanchard.com

Global Headquarters

125 State Place
Escondido, CA 92029 USA

From anywhere: +1 760.489.5005

Within the US: 800.728.6000

For a list of our offices worldwide, visit
www.kenblanchard.com

Appendix 1

INSPIRATIONAL LEADERS SURVEY

Below are the 18 items in our survey that Millennials responded to using a 7-point Likert scale ranging from 1 = Not important at all to 7 = Vitally important.

Inspirational leaders:

1. Verbalize and show appreciation for the efforts and results of employees.
2. Trust and empower employees.
3. Take the time to ask about employees' career aspirations and provide development opportunities.
4. Keep employees informed about changes that are coming and explain why the changes are necessary.
5. Are passionate about the work employees do.
6. Define a vision for employees' future and communicate it regularly and consistently.
7. Work right alongside employees when things are changing or when they have to learn a new task.
8. Provide regular feedback to everyone—both positive and corrective feedback—when and where appropriate.
9. Encourage and push employees to do their best at all times.
10. Are first and foremost good listeners when it comes to effective communications.
11. Win the respect of their employees because they are people who, deep down, respect other people.
12. Allow employees to make mistakes and then help them learn from the errors.
13. Have expertise in their field and are willing to share it with their employees.
14. Make sure that goals AND expectations are clearly stated and then hold people accountable for achieving outcomes while helping them when and where needed.
15. Are open to hearing employees' new ideas and input.
16. Are candid, sincere, and forthcoming with their employees.
17. Do not micromanage. They make the vision and goals clear and allow their employees flexibility in how to achieve the goals.
18. Use a variety of methods to keep in touch with their people—face-to-face contact, electronic means, etc.—and they understand that frequency of communications needs to vary depending on the recipient.